

Greene a Photograph by Amanda Kowalski.

I grow every day and with that my perspectives and interests shift. I take at least one photograph every day. What interests me today may be very different than what interests me three years ago. Although I will be honest, I typically do take at least one picture of my pets a day, but I try and take other pictures too. This is what make photography so fulfilling. Before I started working in the library, I took concert photography. It was thrilling and fun but now I seek out textures and patterns in daily life. My father taught me how to take pictures and now my nineteen-year-old son just began his career as a concert photographer. Every day our journey changes slightly and I hope to capture this through my art.

I love working in Special Collections and Archives. I get to see amazing historic things. These are architectural drawings from the Donald G. Greene papers. The texture and repetition of shapes drew my eye to take this photo. Our legacy can mean different things to different people, seeing individuals' records helps me understand that what I am doing now is just as important as what I did before. We are all important to our community.
